COURSE DESCRIPTION

This course aims to help students gain an overall understanding of how to develop and manage innovations and new products. The course introduces theories of diffusion of innovations, determinants of successful and unsuccessful new products, and consumer perceptions of innovations and new products at different levels of innovativeness. Building on these theoretical perspectives, the course further introduces a systematic new product development (NPD) process from idea generation to concept testing. Students will learn and apply qualitative and quantitative techniques related to innovation and new product development and management in this course.

COURSE OBJECTIVES

Students will learn how to develop a systematic perspective for generating and evaluating new product ideas and concepts and predicting the success of innovations and new products. They will apply theoretical frameworks about innovation and new product development to real-world business issues through lectures, case studies, and group projects.
